Dear Peter,

Thank you for your, no doubt well-intentioned attempt, to entertain the regulars of the Rising Sun on Christmas Day with your unique party piece. However, when we agreed to let you in with your banjo we were under the impression that you had a modicum of talent, having seen your website at <http://members.lycos.co.uk/vagabundo100/>.

We were not expecting a comedy act, and indeed, your impression of a drunken buffoon who, having discovered a banjo in a skip, was now busking with excruciating ineptitude for his next four-pack of Tennants Super, would have been a source of great amusement for a minute or two.

However, it was soon apparent that you intended to persevere with this painful twanging and caterwauling performance for a considerable period, much to the discomfort of our regular customers who were hoping for a more melodic celebration of the festivities. Our only recourse was to turn up the juke box and invite you to refrain from further performance until such time that further tutorials may have improved your musical aspect.

Might we suggest that you study for a few years under a good instructor (preferably in Ireland or Scotland), before you darken our doors again with that infernal stringed instrument of torture.

Whilst we will continue to welcome you as a drinking customer of the Rising Sun, we would like to suggest that you may feel more comfortable in one of the other drinking establishments in the area that delight in a rougher element.
